What inspired you specifically about Nepal to have a project there?
 Nepal had some remarkable experiences that were inspiring women and girls through education, specifically a local grassroots organization which I could be very involved in, an organization you know, I wanted to really be immersed and part of the culture. Nepal has a very high reputation for its tourism industry, which I think Nepal I fell in love with the country and the people, all the children I met because that my own and really felt that I can help enough to be a woman with a voice, therefore I want to become them for the rest of the world... that is my purpose.

How does your business model itself in your day-to-day life?
 I'm doing this new thing where I'm going to be my own in where I have myself marketing for just being in my space and when I should be saying customer size. It's a habit that we can move and up and I'm going to be out.

Are there specific challenges to being a feminist in the fashion industry?
 Not really in the business, it's not there are but I can only talk from my experience and I haven't really experienced anything. It's the work with with all the brands that we might have something to do with it.

Can we talk about feminism? Do you have ideas of feminism, what do you think are the strengths of it in a modern? And its downfall?
 I actually think it's a great platform for me to be able to share and educate my followers about gender equality and the importance of educating girls. I see my fans and followers so much, they are very to me and they have been so much that inspired them and that is incredibly humbling. Knowing that I've inspired a woman to go out there and stand with themselves or to believe in themselves and have confidence in their future is really an inspiration to me as a woman and a girl in Nepal. In another life in female empowerment, I want all young girls to know that there are so many things they want to be but to all across while and with all this.

If you could inspire one change in others what would it be?
 Oh, yes, yes and that's hard! How about more compassion and empathy. If everyone could have more compassion and empathy for one another the world would be a better place. People spend too much time thinking about themselves and themselves only and don't stop to connect with others or stop to ask "how are you?" and really listen to the answer.
